VOL. 33, NO. 48 | CAMPBELL, SANTA CLARA COUNTY, CALIFORNIA | TUESDAY, AUG. 5, 1930

Current Comment

The Campbell Press is observing a strictly neutral position in the matter of "sheriff, sheriff, who'se going to be sheriff?" We are extolling the virtues of no candidate, and at the same time we are refraining from adding mud to an already rather murky situation. We are, however, going to go so far as to publicly admire and commend the action of James Kidward in making a declaration of his stand in this and other papers. With plenty of mud in the shape of accusations and denials blotting the fair escutcheon of Santa Clara county it would be a fine thing for all sheriff candidates to publish in the county press a complete statement of what they stood for ,their qualifications—and why, if any.

By the way, it is reported that Mr. Kidward, who is also a member of the local high school board of trustees, has patched up his differences with the other members of the organization and the entire group see eye to eye with one another on matters of vital importance. This is very gratifying to the general public who, as a rule, is obliged to suffer the recoil of all school board explosions.

Things are looking up around here , what with a street dance slated for this week and a carnival in nightly operation near the Southern Pacific right of way. It carries us back to the middle west, where the band plays on Saturday nights and pleasant groups stroll the streets or linger in conversation in the "square." A custom not to be regarded as humorous—this practise of getting better acquainted with your fellow-townsman after the rush hours of the day. Let's have a crowd at the dance. If we're too out of the running, we can at least add our presence to the gayety.

Current hard times remind us of a character we knew a number of years ago in Montana. "Hard Times Joe' was the name he never failed to answer to, and one instance we remember in particular. He had driven the 14 miles to town to get some pipe to run from a spring to his house. It came to a cent a foot more than he had figured on, so he left without the needed pipe, and his moan of "hard times" could be heard until his rig was out of sight over the hill. Joe had a beautiful farm, protected by a line of rugged buttes on the north; he had a marvelous spring—which many farmers lack — several span of big horses, good crops and money in the bank, and yet he had thought himself into an imaginary state of poverty. A lot of it is in the mind folks—and what are we going to do about it?

We in Campbell could keep at least our own community prosperous by trading exclusively at home where ,with a few exceptions, we can secure the necessities of life. Our food purveyors handle the same brands as do merchants elsewhere, and it is up to us to justify their faith in the town with our patronage. If we can circulate our money in our own community we would enjoy prosperity. Think it over before you go to town for something that may be had in Campbell.

That's all.

DR. JAMES FANNING TO OPEN DENTAL OFFICE THIS WEEK

Dr. James E. Fanning, recently of Richmond, Calif., is this week opening a dental office and laboratory in the B. O. Curry building on Campbell avenue. The new office has all the latest equipment and is beautifully decorated in the modern manner. Dr. Fanning is a graduate of the University of California where he later taught in the school of dentistry and has practised a number of years at Richmond. He is very favorably impressed with Campbell, having selected it from among several possible locations.

James C. Fanning, the Doctor's father, and Henry F. Oline, his brother-in-law, have been in town for several days, helping get the office in readiness. They will return shortly to Richmond, their home, where Mr. Fanning is a conductor on the Southern Pacific.

Mrs. Fanning and small daughter, Patricia Jean, are not here yet, but Dr. Fanning expects to bring them down as soon as he can secure housing facilities.

Irving Townsend Tells Us To Come To The Carlsbad Caverns

A letter received this week from Irving Townsend, who is doing ranger duty at Carlsbad Cavern, New Mexico, tells at some length of the beauties of this national monument. He urges local people who are planning a tour in that direction to be sure and take in the caverns. He reports that Miss Clarabelle Boesch has been there, and a number from San Jose.

The roads, according to Mr. Townsend, are fine, and as a side trip on a trip to the Grand Canyon it is unsurpassed and is easily accessible.

The cavern is situated near the town of Carlsbad, which is itself a tourist mecca. Auto camps, free swimming pools and so forth are very attractive and the beauties of the cavern are actually awe-inspiring. We have a descriptive pamphlet prospective tourists are welcome to look it over.

The regular meeting of the Ada Rebekah lodge will be held this Tuesday evening with the new noble grand, Josephine LaBarbera, in charge. Emma Bulmore, Theresa Bryden and Jessie Silberbauer will be in charge of the social hour.

DISABLED VETS TO GET ADDITIONAL AID, SAYS MELVIN

The recent bill amending the World War veterans act has been signed by President Hoover, and is now in effect is the word received from Washington by Edwin H. Melvin, post service officer of the Los Gatos American Legion. In part, it provides that a veteran now suffering from a disability not incurred in service is entitled to a disability allowance of $12 per month for a 25 per cent disability; $18 for a 50 per cent disability; $24 for a 75 per cent disability, and $40 per month for a total permanent disability. Date of payment starts with date of application. No disability allowance shall be paid to any person not entitled to exemption from the payment of a federal income tax. This allowance has nothing to do with compensation , and does not effect veterans suffering from disabilities incurred in in wartime service.

Melvin has the blanks for making such a claim, and the same may be secured from him at his office in Los Gatos at no charge.

SLEEVELESS JACKET FAVORED

VIEWING the color situation, one becomes conscious of the increasing favor for tones of green. The emphasis placed on green is noticeable especially in the dark, tiny patterned silks which are so decidedly smart for daytime wear. Silks which pattern black backgrounds with bright green motifs are seen perhaps as often, if not oftener, than any other combination.

Likewise in the more lightsome color effects green is widely featured. The stunning silk which fashions the frock in the picture is in tones of green with beige for the background. The bordered edge is in the two colors.

Bordered silks are receiving considerable attention this season which is true in regard to both dark and light weaves. The gay peasant prints which have so enhanced the sports realm with their wealth of color and design these last weeks, play up the border note in every key. The intrigue of bordered materials is not alone in their gay colorings, but the opportunity they offer for ingenious treatments is one of their chief attractions in the eyes of ambitious designers. It is very evident that the gown in the picture was styled with a view to displaying the border to best advantage.

In regard to the new georgettes and chiffons for fall, we may expect to see them run with narrow stripes and variously marked with interweavings of metal thread.

Stiff silks are being featured in advance collections. These include taffeta, faille, moire and duchess satin. The trend toward elegance is manifest in the early silk showings. All signs point to elaborately designed fabrics. The art of weaving is to be revived or rather emphasized in broche treatments of stiff silks, in novel jacquard patternings, in formal Eighteenth century brocades, fabrics for evening being distinguished with all the elegance and elaboration at the command of skilled artists of the loom. It is already an accepted fact that this fall and winter will see the observance of strictly formal fashions for formal occasions.

Why Worry About Worry?

A journalist once inquired of a Chinese patriarch why it is that the Chinese people do not worry. The Chinese philosopher replied that that was something he never worried about.

Compass: A Short Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

He had just met a new friend—the little boy adventurer whose name was David.

He wondered what the name of his friend might be and he had therefore just asked him.

The friend had told him that his name was Compass.

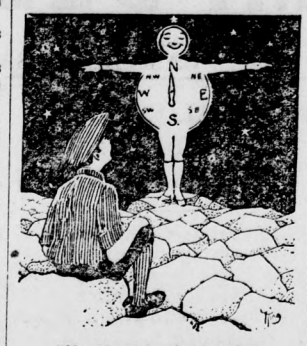
He seemed very pleased about his name, and as David asked him more questions Compass repeated his name once more.

"Yes, my name is Compass, and I always get the head and tail of everything. You know some never do. They say they can't see the head or tail of anything. But I do because I make it a rule to always keep myself well brushed up on the four most important points, North, East, South and West.

"Beautiful earth, isn't it?" he asked suddenly. "You've no idea how much I'm attracted by it."

He seemed very much excited about this. "Yes, the earth attracts me and it is responsible for making me point with my head to the north and my face to the south, while to the right of me is always the east and to the left of me is always the west.

"I keep in touch, too, with what is going on, for you may have heard that the first letters of the four points I keep so well brushed up on spell News."



"My Head to the North."

"You must be a great favorite," David said.

"People are always asking each other what the news is."

"I am," said Compass. "And from the East and the North and the South and the West come all sorts of interesting facts and stories which make up the great news of the world.

"But my great job is in telling directions. You can also tell direction by the sun. I don't want to claim all the glory. Can't, for that matter, anyway.

"The midday sun is south of where you live and it casts its shadows toward the north.

"That is why, you know, the moss upon trees in your part of the world always grows so well on the north side of the trees.

"If you are ever lost in the woods, David, you can tell directions by seeing where the moss is. You know how people choose the cool part of the piazza—so do the mosses choose the cool part of trees.

"Of course there are always things we don't like about our jobs. I always have to look straight ahead and point to the north when I'm on duty.

"No matter how much I should want to turn around and point south I couldn't do that.

"It would confuse people and I'd be a disgrace to the Compass family—I'd be considered a Compass of no use and of no value and a failure."

With that Compass was off and David watched him. He was facing the north and he held out his arms a little to either side as though to show that on the right he was pointing to the east and on the left he was pointing to the west and that back of him was the south.

"Good-by, Compass," David called.

"Good-by," Compass shouted.

But he did not turn his head. He was on duty now.

Summer Salads

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"If you would know the flavor of a pie
The juicy smell, the spice and taste,
You must be patient till the fiery core is cool
Then bite a little deeper than the crust.

If you would know the flavor of a man
God's mud-pie made of Eden's dew and dust
Be patient till love's fire has warmed him through
And look a little deeper than the crust."

SOME of these salads are more adapted for entertaining than for every day's use:

Butterfly Salad.—Split a small banana into halves and dip into lemon juice to keep it from discoloring. On either side of the banana, placed on lettuce, put half slices of pineapple to form the wings to the banana body, the rounded edge toward the banana. Garnish the wing with red and yellow aspics or fruit gelatins. Garnish the banana with chopped ripe olives and capers. Serve with french dressing after being well chilled.

Beach Club Salad.—Fill a scalloped grapefruit shell with shredded lettuce and diced grapefruit which have been well mixed with mayonnaise. Decorate the top with halved cherries. Serve on lettuce.

Cheese Salad.—Arrange a nest of shredded lettuce and place on it finely shredded celery, apples and radishes all cut into small shoe strings. Mix with creamy mayonnaise, using two tablespoonfuls of mayonnaise to a half cupful of whipped cream. Decorate with rings of olives in the center of which has been piped a rose of cream cheese. Serve with french dressing.

Chicken Salad.—Dice cooked seasoned chicken and add one-third of the amount of cooked tender veal, also diced; add an equal quantity of diced celery and marinate an hour or more with french dressing. Take two or three hard cooked eggs coarsely cut, a teaspoonful of chopped capers and mix with mayonnaise. Put into a mold to shape. Turn out on a bed of lettuce on a chilled platter and serve garnished with capers and quartered hard cooked eggs.

Punishment by Ostracism

Ostracism was introduced in Greece by Clisthenes about 510 B. C. Aelian says that Clisthenes was the first to be ostracized. In 488-487 B. C., Hipparchus was exiled and a few years later Xanthippus and Aristides were banished in this fashion.

Clarence Darrow, the lawyer, related at a dinner in Chicago the story of a man whose double life had been exposed.

"The man claimed," said Darrow, "that nowadays we are all entitled to double lives. He pointed to this playwright and that novelist who advocate free love. But he was put out of the church anyhow. His claim didn't go over.

"As one of the church deacons remarked to me afterward, his claim had about as much sense to it as the bigamist's:

"'What is home without another?'"

THE WEEKLY SHORT STORY—By W. H. COLCLOUGH

"GO ON, Jackson, go on! I tell you there is no use losing two lives. We are lost, hopelessly lost. We can't both get out. I am an old man with only a few years left to live, anyway."

Jackson weakened under the battery of the old man's logic. Nevertheless, he continued to register protests.

"We can surely make it," he said. "I can't leave you, Mr. Burton. Let's struggle on together. You know these woods and I will help you."

"No, Jackson, we are done for. Go on without me—go straight south. I don't know how far, but I know that's the direction. Go south and you will come to a river. Follow it the way the stream flows and you will be sure to come to a hunter's cabin. Stay there until morning and then get help, and come back here—back track and get my body."

The old man wheezed his commands. He staggered.

"Well, Mr. Burton, I don't like to leave you this way, and—"

"Go, Jackson," said Mr. Burton. "You haven't long. The storm's increasing. Leave me here. Tell them you were game, but that I sent you away. Hurry, Jackson."

Jackson gripped the old man's hand and started toward the trackless south and safety. In twenty paces he stopped. He couldn't leave him. What would people say? What would the men at the office say? Besides, this was a coward's trick. It wasn't the Law of the North.

Why did they get into this fix anyway? Mr. Burton was supposed to be the best woodsman in this part of the Canadian Northland, and hunted here year after year. That is how it happened that Jackson, a young executive in Burton's big plant, had accepted an invitation to go moose hunting. Burton was old, but he was experienced—used to hunting without bothering about a guide in this territory.

But the unexpected had happened. Night was coming. They had been lost for several hours, and the old man was exhausted. And what had started as a drizzling rain gave promise of turning into snow before morning.

Yes—it seemed as if he had a right to the chance for his life, but—

In two minutes he was back beside the old man.

"Mr. Burton—I'm not going. You can stay where you like, but we stay together, and if we go our we'll go out together."

"You fool, Jackson," the old man argued. "You must go!"

But Jackson proceeded to break off such spruce boughs as he could gather and make a rude shelter under the trees.

It was cold. No fire. Garments soaked. The old man trembling. Up north the howling of a wolf. In three seconds, an answer strangely and menacingly near echoed through the woods. A large tree not far away split with a sound like a rifle. They huddled together as best they could for warmth. Jackson shivered. The old man stirred.

"Jackson, I hear bells," he said. "Listen, Jackson! Don't you hear bells? Let's try again, Jackson. I think I know now how to get out of this place."

Vainly Jackson tried to pacify the older man and point out to him the futility of trying to find the way through a Canadian forest at night. Any hunter, even a tenderfoot, knows the impossibility of such a task.

But the old man, president of a large business organization, and used to having his orders promptly obeyed, insisted.

"I'll stay here," Jackson thought, "and let the old fool go on alone. He's crazy now." And he let Burton start out in the darkness.

But in a few minutes Jackson was following him.

"Look, Jackson, there's a light."

"Yes, a light, Mr. Burton." He might as well humor the wanderings of the half-crazed mind.

But—what was it? There was a light. Were they both crazy now? wondered Jackson as they stumbled on through the forest. It was a real light that shone and beckoned through the trees.

Then he felt a strange change come over the tottering old man. He straightened up and with resolute step marched toward the light. In ten paces they were in a small clearing. In the center stood a cabin with smoke pouring from its stove-pipe chimney. A wolf-like dog lifted his muzzle toward the sky and uttered a long-drawn howl and then went, with rattling chain, to his kennel.

Jackson pinched himself to see if he were awake. The door to the hut flew open. As Mr. Burton tramped in Jackson saw a middle-aged man in short sleeves and smoking his pipe.

"You're late, chief," he said. "I was afraid you were lost—" "No no, Brown," said Burton. "I sure wasn't lost. You couldn't get lost with Broncho howling like a wolf every few minutes the way he always does when I am out in the woods, even if I didn't know my way around in this country as well as I do. No, Brown, I wasn't lost, but I had a young man I want to make manager of my western branch. I was testing him out. And, Brown, he'll do. I tell you he'll do, Brown."

GAY COLORS FOR THE CHILDREN

THAT same enthusiasm for shantung and kindred washable silks, which has been at topnotch point all season in the adult world of fashion, finds its counterpart in the children's realm. Shantung is especially adaptable to little folks' wear, for its laundering qualities are incomparable. With such a wealth of beautiful colorings as this attractive silk weave offers its lure to the designer of styles for the younger generation is increased.

Now that the use of two or more colors together is an outstanding trend of the mode, the idea is being put into effect with gratifying results, in the styling of frocks for little girls. For the attractive dress in the picture, the Paris designer very successfully works shantung in contrast, using ciel blue for the yoke and the wide border at the hem line, with natural toned for the body of the dress. The two colors are worked together with hand fagoting, thus giving the frock an exquisite touch. The transparent horsehair hat worn is in matching blue.

Shantung is contrasted in various other pleasing ways, in the making of juvenile frocks. A most wearable type which features two colors is the kilt pleated ensemble, for which the skirt of one color shantung is made to button onto the blouse of another, with the jacket matching the former. Navy blue or brown shantung with blouse in sunflower yellow, lime green or hyacinth blue, or perhaps Paton rose (shantung comes in all these colors) makes a charming suit for the junior miss and her younger sister.

To be very modish a hat of the two silks should top this ensemble, using one color for the crown and top brim, facing the latter with the other tone.

Another practical costume of shantung for the little girl tops a one-piece frock of white or natural color or any solid pastel tint with a separate jacket of bright print shantung or a contrasting monotone.

CHILDREN CRY FOR IT—

CHILDREN hate to take medicine as a rule, but every child loves the taste of Castoria. And this pure vegetable preparation is just as good as it tastes; just as bland and just as harmless as the recipe reads.

When Baby's cry warns of colic, a few drops of Castoria has him soothed, asleep again in a jiffy. Nothing is more valuable in diarrhea. When coated tongue or bad breath tell of constipation, invoke its gentle aid to cleanse and regulate a child's bowels. In colds or children's diseases, you should use it to keep the system from clogging.

Castoria is sold in every drug store; the genuine always bears Chas. H. Fletcher's signature.

WHAT WENT BEFORE

Renewing a childhood attachment, Ernestine Briceland, of a wealthy family, is attracted by Will Todd, newspaper artist.

"Is your mother just the same? She had such a pleasant voice, but she was bossy. Kind of a queen I admired her tremendously. She fitted entirely my juvenile notions of a grand lady."

Ernestine laughed now.

"There's nobody like mamma for managing every one," she admitted.

They came to the Sun offices, and as they went in through the squirrel cage, the rhythmic crash of great presses came muffled to Ernestine's ears. Will took her over the whole place.

"Upstairs and downstairs and in my lady's chamber," he said.

In the syndicate rooms he introduced her to half a dozen young men who were much impressed with her youth and beauty. He showed her the stool he sat on, the work on his board.

Mr. Poole came out and shook hands with her, and she was conscious of disappointment. He was a huge, untidy old man, with fat cheeks that had fallen a little and a shiny bald head. But his eyes were intelligent, his voice was very kind. She felt that she might like him, if she could only know him.

Will's vanity seemed excessive. Although she knew he was proud to show her, he was none the less proud of himself. But it was like the vanity of a capable child, not at all displeasing. Not until they got into the street again did Ernestine realize that they had walked all over the big plant with their fingers interlaced. But she clung to him now shamelessly. He was such an old friend. She was filled with strange reluctance that this vivid hour should end.

He said good by at the bus, without mentioning another meeting. Ernestine could not let it go at that.

"But you must come to see me," she said, as the conductor waited impatiently for her to board the bus. "I want to see you again, Will."

"Sure," he said vaguely. His mind had already gone back to work. "Sure. Call me up some day."

Upon leaving the bus Ernestine went quickly along toward home. Her feet were dancing, and her heart was dancing, too. She was extraordinarily happy and full of life.

Some one was standing on their doorstep watching her, waiting for her. She ran up the steps, and Loring Hamilton was there, big and fair and handsome, in his dark coat, with the fur collar.

"Hello, Lorrie. Have to rush in. I'm late. Are you leaving?"

He looked down at her the light from the drawing room window streaming on to his face and Ernestine paused, surprised. She was filled with an inward dismay, for she had never seen him like this. His face, usually complacent, was keen now, his blue eyes were brilliant sparks, his whole countenance quickened and fired. His voice, when he spoke again, had a barely perceptible quaver.

"Why were you running, Ernestine? You're still a kid half the time. When I heard you running, I knew it was you, because my heart began to run, too."

"Nonsense," said Ernestine briskly, but he was persistent.

"I was just going away, disappointed that I hadn't seen you, and here I have you alone for a moment at last. I've been wanting to tell you how beautiful you are, since you're grown. Where have you been? Your face is shining. I could see it luminously in the dark street. Ernestine—don't be silly. I'm trying to tell you I care for you—I—"

She pulled away from him with determination.

"You're the silly one," she said impatiently. "And dumb, as well." She passed him quickly, and closed the door behind her, shutting out his handsome, desirous face.

In her room, dressing for dinner, she was furious with him for intruding on the enchantment of her hour with Will. Didn't he know that he had made himself conspicuous, all last year, with his attentions to Lillian? He was not her lover. What was the matter with him?

Lillian came in from her room which adjoined Ernestine's and the younger sister looked at the elder one with old but ever-fresh admiration.

"Loring was kidding me," she told herself. "Of course he's crazy about Lillian."

Lillian was ash blond, and very lovely. Her eyes were a kind of deep violet, serene calm eyes, and her lips were thin and bright red, beautifully cut. Her nose was patrician, her skin a clear milky white, and she wore just enough rouge to give her a faint rose color and make her eyes more lovely. The two girls plunged at once into the conversation of sisters, without being slowed up or held back.

"I've been to the matinee with Sadie Juel. Sadie's seen Delancey's show ten times. She's as crazy as she can be. Imagine falling in love with an actor. She's written him letters and letters. But he won't see her."

"She is kind of old for that line," said Ernestine, perched on the edge of her bed, a silk stocking in her hands. "I saw Will Todd today."

"Will Todd? Who is he?"

Ernestine reminded her, and Lillian admitted that she remembered.

"He's charming," Ernestine said. "I thought I'd ask mamma to invite him for tea some afternoon, or for dinner some night when he doesn't work."

Lillian stared then laughed. "If you want to see him again if you want an affair with him, don't tell mamma," she advised Ernestine. "For that will be the end of it. A little lame boy about the house one summer is quite a different matter from an attractive grown man. Mamma will make him miserable."

Ernestine considered this. "I don't see why," she said stubbornly.

"Certainly you see, darling," said Lillian. "We are not to have any irregular affairs now. We are to marry."

"Well," said Ernestine, "what of it? You can't marry unless you're asked. I can be friends with Will without marrying him, can't I?"

"I doubt it," said Lillian calmly. "You always go to such extremes, Ernestine. You are always blundering around, taking such awful chances and making wild friends. You've been spoiled and have had your way about lots of things. But this is one thing you can't have."

Ernestine pooh-poohed Lillian but felt at the same time that she would say nothing about Will just now.

"Beth's going to be married. She's going to marry Johnnie Allison."

"I'm not surprised, are you?" asked Ernestine, thinking of Will's gestures—the way he moved his hands continually.

"No, I'm not surprised. It's just what she wanted. One ought to know what one wants, I do. We talked about it today."

"I can tell you what you want without talking to you about it," said Ernestine with sisterly decision. "You want a house in Hubbard Woods, or else one of those big co-operatively owned apartments on the drive, near down town. And you want a limousine and a rich, handsome husband. You've got it all planned out."

"In detail," agreed Lillian, unperturbed. "Pretty much as you named it. I want Loring, for myself—"

"Why don't you ask him?" exploded Ernestine, her feelings a confusion of resentment that Lillian had showed her the fallacy of her own dream, of hurt for her sister, that Loring should have been such a fool, of scorn for these plotters.

"I probably won't need to," Lillian answered, and went on, before Ernestine could interrupt her again: "If not Loring, then somebody much like him. I merely mentioned him as an example. After I've been married a few years, I want a son, and if I get along nicely, I wouldn't mind a daughter. I want everything right. A man who is already a member of good clubs, so that the money he makes will take us in the right direction, and we won't have to stand and wait. All right, go on and hoot. I know what I want, anyhow, and that's more than you know." She looked at Ernestine with some severity, and added darkly: "What's more, I'll get it. Watch me."

Ernestine could see Lillian as she had planned it all out. A correct house, a correct husband, perhaps even a correct baby or two. The same old business over and over, with correct people coming and going and Loring stalking handsomely about.

Not for her. She knew what she wanted. She wanted love! She wanted something not mentioned on Lillian's list. She wanted passionate, romantic love. She wanted adventure, an inevitable, great adventure.

Suddenly she stood trembling, her heart beating with great strong strokes. She was terrified with the intensity of her feeling, with the vivid, almost material picture of Will Todd's violent personality before her. One person, one in all the world, and never anybody else. She wanted love, and all her wakening instincts warned her that she had found it.

CHAPTER II

The Lady Promises.

AGAIN and again Ernestine resolved to tell mamma all about Will, but again and again her confidences faltered before mamma's bright energy before mamma's staccato bossiness. It was really her first secret from her family, and she did not feel quite right about it. Of course she was old enough to have a friend if she wanted one, a friend of her own choosing, but Lillian's attitude that she was having an "affair," a romance on the side purely for the thrill of it, dismayed her. Yet she couldn't tell mamma, and an incident occurred which sealed her silence.

She had called Will on the telephone the next morning after her encounter with him on the street and that had been the beginning of an absorbing intimacy. He worked in the afternoon and at night six days a week. He had nothing better to do with his forenoons and his luncheon hour than share them with Ernestine. But the very time of those engagements made Ernestine safe from curiosity. It was a time of day exclusively the property of women in mamma's world. It would never have occurred to mamma that a love affair could have proceeded during a succession of forenoons.

And a love affair was what it rapidly became. Ernestine could not prolong the time with Will enough to suit her, and his eagerness soon matched, then outrode, her own. His enthusiasm, his energy were compelling and Ernestine felt the rousing and stirring of her own personality in touch with his. Within a week she was desperately in love. She had no room for any thought and feeling but those which concerned Will Todd. Presently she realized that the termination of their friendship would be a true catastrophe, and with this realization she began to practice secrecy with skill and determination.

One blowy, gusty, Sunday morning in December she escaped church and met him and talked, hand in hand, as they always talked, quickly, starvedly.

Eventually a little silence fell between them, and in its magic, without speaking a word, they turned and kissed each other, and smiled a little dimly and leaned together. The touch of lips, and then the pressure of cheek to cheek, was magic. His arms slipped about her, and for a long, long time they sat in a swing of joy.

There was no word spoken, no promise, but Ernestine knew now that she must tell mamma. The family was home from church when she reached the house, sitting in the big living room, all of them engrossed in gossip. Mamma looked at Ernestine sharply.

"Why didn't you come to church?"

"I went for a walk," evaded Ernestine, and her face flamed with color, for they all looked at her, and she felt that Will's love-making was visible upon her. Mamma said no more, however, and Lillian turned to her with the news.

"You remember I told you Sadie Hall was in love with the actor Lon Delancey?" Ernestine nodded and Lillian said with satisfaction "Well, she finally succeeded in meeting him, and they were married last night. Every one was talking about it in church this morning."

"Well, what of it?" said Ernestine. "She can marry him, can't she?"

"Ernestine!" said her father sternly. "You know it isn't suitable." He was a big man, a little too stout, with a handsome florid face. His brown eyes were warm and kind, but his big nose was acquisitive, his mouth stern and hard, a man of brilliant mind, but limited by prejudices.

"It is her money he wants," said papa, "and nothing else. The girl's a fool, and was not brought up properly, or she would never have done such a thing."

Loring put in his oar. He was always there on Sundays, though Ernestine, who was tired of having him around.

"Any man who urges a girl to keep her love affair a secret from her folks is a blackguard, and a girl may as well realize it first as last. No real man would do such a thing. He would be honorable." He looked at her when he said it with such meaning that Ernestine felt a faint dismay.

"But how ridiculous," she exclaimed. "You all know, every one of you, that if she had told her folks of her infatuation they would have carried her off to Europe, or had him forced out of town. They would have separated them instantly."

"But that's why she ought to tell her people," said papa. "No girl can trust her own judgment, when she gets out of her own class. Her people know best, and she should confide in them."

All this time mamma had been watching Ernestine. Mamma was so pretty, with her violet eyes, and smooth, fair hair, and her slender, vigorous body. But mamma was sharp.

"Neither of my girls would do such a thing," she said now in her soft, quick voice, but with a meaning that Ernestine and Lillian both sensed. "I am sure that neither of my little girls would do such a thing to me—have a secret love affair. Would either of you?"

"Don't be nutty, mamma," advised Lillian, and Ernestine was silent.

Later, alone, Lillian turned to Ernestine eagerly.

"You'd better come across, I think the folks are on to you."

"You haven't told them?"

"Of course not," said Lillian, impatiently. "It's your own business. But, Ernestine, you aren't really going to fall in love with him, are you? Papa would be furious."

Ernestine shook the bright tears from her eyes and smiled at Lillian. After a moment, Lillian went on uncertainly.

"Loring saw you yesterday morning. He asked me who the young man was, and I told him, but asked him not to mention it. Still he may tell. He's awfully fond of you, Ernestine. He's always telling me that you are just like a little sister to him. He might feel it his duty to tell Papa about you and Will."

"But there's nothing about Will that anybody could object to," protested Ernestine. "I'm not engaged to him, but if I should become engaged, I don't see who could care. He's fine and good and gentle. He's brave, too, a real man."

"But You Know Just How Papa Would React to Will Todd."

Lillian shook her head.

"It's your funeral," she said, with the heartless laissez-faire of her generation, which feared, above all things, that it might become its brother's keeper. "But you know just how papa would react to Will Todd. He's the son of papa's old carpenter. He's poor, and he hasn't been to school, and he's not very strong—there's nothing but objections to such an idea, Ernestine. Anyhow, I can't see why you could let yourself even think of such a thing as getting engaged. Imagine taking a chance like that!"

* * * * * * *

Will said nothing about marriage. He was full of talk, overflowing with his own vitality, enraptured with Ernestine's beauty and dearness. One day, however, when they had gone for their usual walk north along the lake shore, he seemed oddly silent and thoughtful, and at times he looked at her, as though wondering whether to speak his mind or not. When he left her, he kissed her again and again, and said oddly, "Remember me," as though it were farewell.

"I'll see you tomorrow," she whispered to him, and turned her fur collar up against the wind.

But she did not see him the next day, although she waited at their rendezvous for an hour past the time. Nor the next day. By the third day she was filled with deep dismay and fear. All sorts of questions whirled through her mind. Perhaps he had tired of her. It might be that the affair had run out for him, that he had never intended to make more than a sweet heart out of her.

But she had only to think of his bright, honorable face to know that there was some other reason behind his attitude. She had only to think of his eager kisses to know that he cared. She called him on the telephone at his home, at ten o'clock. His mother answered and said, in a low voice, that he was sleeping.

"Would you waken him? It's important," she said, and stood shaking in the telephone booth, until she heard his voice, husky with sleep.

"This is Ernestine," she said trembling.

At once there was an electric silence, and then he said in a voice now thoroughly awake:

"Well?"

She could have cried. "What's the matter, Will? Aren't you going to see me again?"

"Where are you?"

"I'm at the drug store, at Wilson and Sheridan."

"I'll be there within an hour," he told her.

He had not had breakfast, he said, shaking hands with her formally when they met. They went into a little white tiled coffee shop, and he ordered his breakfast and sat opposite her in silent waiting. He looked terrible. His face, often white, was ravaged, and his eyes burned. But he was calm. He had reached some decision, and Ernestine knew that the initiative rested on her.

"What's the matter, Will?" she asked him, trembling again, and hating herself for it. It was awful to be such a slave.

"Your mother phoned me yesterday."

"Mamma!"

"Sure—she asked me to come there to tea this afternoon. I told her I had to work. Didn't you know she was going to ask me? I thought perhaps you told her to invite me," said Will.

Crusoe Not in It With Indian Woman Recluse

The story of a woman "Robinson Crusoe" who lived alone on an island for 20 long years is told by Dr. Roy L. Moodie, who has been delving into the records of old native life in the region of Santa Monica, Calif., in his study of prehistoric diseases in America.

The feminine Crusoe had been a member of a small group of Indians which lived on San Nicholas island, off the California coast, about 100 years ago. The Spanish fathers persuaded the group to leave their lonely island and find better protection at the Santa Barbara mission. But this woman refused to come. All alone she demonstrated her self-sufficiency in the world by making her home of whale ribs and brush, and by living off the abundant fish, abalones, birds, seals and some plant products. She made her clothing of bird skins. When at last she was brought to the mission she died within six weeks.

The island possesses many relics of aboriginal life, but none so romantic as the record of the last woman, Doctor Moodie said.—Kansas City Star's Science Service.

Indoor Weather Control

It isn't only the heat, but the humidity and the air motion that affect the destiny of whole races. Weather to primitive man was the most important factor in life. In the tropics and the subpolar regions it still remains master of the situation.

Civilized man, however, from the time of the domestication of fire, has been progressing slowly in the art of making his own weather indoors. It is now possible to control heat, relative humidity and rate of air motion in any space between four walls, a ceiling and a floor. From factories and public buildings the art of manufacturing weather and controlling it is spreading into homes and apartments. The next few years will see radical progress.

Prizes for Churchgoers

Prizes are being given by a church near Glasgow, Scotland, to those who attend most regularly. On prize-award day the procession of winners is among the strangest to leave a house of worship. On a recent Sunday one woman carried a pair of parasols, while others had tin kettles, mugs, baskets and various other articles.

Riley Has Fine Record Of Service In Office Of State Controller

Reports from all parts of California indicate a preponderance of support for Ray L. Riley in his campaign to succeed himself as state controller. A host of volunteer workers is mobilized in every county, his support coming very largely men and women who are familiar with the splendid record he has made for himself as the guardian of the money of the people of California.

Ray L. Riley has had nine years experience as state controller and is a nationally recognized authority on problems of taxation. He has served with distinction as a member of the California tax commission. He is a member of the executive committee of the National Tax association and has taken an active interest in the work of that body for the past ten years as the official delegate from California.

During his nine years as controller Riley has become the accepted authority on the financial condition of the state and the important bearing the state finances has on taxes. His studies along this line have been received elsewhere with deep respect and their influence has been to keep our taxes properly balanced. Editorial opinion on state taxes has for years reflected Riley's influence.

1¢ a meal — to cook with electricity

And the electric range costs no more than any good range

Electric cooking has an aristocratic "atmosphere."

However, fine "atmosphere" should not mislead any one from true dollar-and-cents facts. Here they are:

You can cook a complete meal for four people with 4c worth of electricity. In addition, the price of an electric range itself is no more than any good range.

And how the electric range improves cooking! — and gives you more time for out-of-the-kitchen activities. For electric cooking can be entirely automatic. After a meal is placed in the oven, you never have to watch it — or baste the meat. Moreover, the electric range is the "keynote" for a beautiful, clean kitchen.

Today's electric range has Improved Cooking Elements, 29 to 50% speedier. Fully enameled Rust-Proof Oven. Smokeless Broiler Pan. Smooth Porcelain Enamel which wipes clean easily. Cooker Pot. Automatic Oven Temperature Control, and a Special Time Clock for automatically turning the oven current on and off while you're away.

Come into our office or a dealer's store and see the fine new electric ranges. And remember, modern electric cooking IS economical.

FOR SHERIFF

JIM KIDWARD

HE WILL MAKE GOOD

A Campaign Committee from all parts of Santa Clara County, consisting of farmers, laborers, building and loan members, professional and business men, in February of this year made a canvass for a logical candidate for Sheriff—one that we are satisfied was fully qualified, that had real knowledge of criminal and civil business, and was a proven executive business man.

We were all of the same opinion that we needed a change in the office of Sheriff of Santa Clara County.

We worked secretly and kept free from all the different political factions, and a committee of five from our number called upon Jim Kidward several times before he would consent to become a candidate. We promised to give him our full support and to make a canvass of the County in his behalf.

Our committee is strong and is being actively supported by its constituents in: San Jose, Palo Alto, Mountain View, Gilroy, Morgan Hill, Sunnyvale, Los Altos, San Martin, Campbell, Alma, Almaden, Alviso, Agnew, Burrell, Berryessa, Coyote, Evergreen, Franklin District, Meridian District, Milpitas, Wrights, and Robertsville.

We are making a clean fight, and are backing Mr. Kidward solely on his qualifications for the office of Sheriff, without attacking the policies or records of any of his opponents.

The majority of our committee has known Jim Kidward for many years, and we all know his qualifications. His sponsors are all building and loan members, bankers, and realtors, whose names are on file in the County Clerk's office. They are all men of sound judgment.

Here are his qualifications:

He has the experience
He has a fine record as a criminal and civil officer.
He is a business man with executive ability.
He has experience in organizing.
He is a man of good judgment.
He will appoint clean men as deputies.
He will retain all qualified deputies now in office.
If elected will appoint a deputy sheriff in and for Campbell.
He will be human in his treatment of all unfortunates.
He has the personality necessary to meet the public.
He is a self-made man.
He cleaned up the dives on the Alameda while a police officer.
He made good as Chief of Police, and cleaned up the dives in the city of San Jose.
He succeeded in the livery and hack business.
He succeeded in the orchard business.
He has made good as a realtor.
He will not encroach on the privacy of your home life.
He will protect your boys and girls by closing pits and deadfalls.
He stands for enforcement of law and order.

POULTRY

POULTRY KEEPERS SHOULD CULL NOW

Low-Producing Hen or Undersized Pullet Must Go.

Poultry keepers should cull out all the "boarder" or nonproducing hens together with those pullets that are weak and do not show desirable qualities.

"In this way," says A. G. Oliver, poultry specialist at the North Carolina state college, the producer gets a much higher price for his stock than is possible later on in the year when the market is glutted, and in addition, a large amount of feed is saved."

By going through the flock every week or two after the first of June, the owner can easily pick out the cull hens and market them in an orderly way. This process should be followed from the first of June until the first of October.

Mr. Oliver states that the culling done through the summer months is different from that done in October and November. The first is to remove the poor individuals, while that done in the fall is to select the best hens for flock improvement.

As long as a flock is giving 50 per cent production, it is a waste of time to go over the birds, but as soon as the production drops to 20 or 30 per cent, culling should begin. The farmer will know how many well developed and desirable early-hatched pullets he has. The low-producing hen or the undersized pullet should be taken from the flock and sold.

Those hens that lay only four to six months should be disposed of first and the others gradually culled out until only those that lay eight or nine months are left, he states.

Encourage Chicks to Roost at Early Age

Chicks should be encouraged to roost as soon as well feathered, according to Stephen M. Walford, Purdue university.

Early roosting will do much to prevent smothering and crowding in the corners of the house, which also stunts the growth of birds that do not die in the huddle.

If heavy breeds of chicks do not take quickly to the new custom they may be compelled to use roosts by putting in slanting roosts which have chicken netting, preventing their getting on the floor of the corners.

After chicks have become accustomed to roosting they can be raised to the customary height or a couple of feet above the floor.

Confining Hens Found to Be Most Profitable

Farmers who have changed their flocks of hens from ranging on the farm at large to a smaller area that can be fenced against other poultry and animals, have found that their hens laid more eggs and had less disease, as the ground was free from worms and disease in the beginning.

The reason for this is that generally hens in smaller yards are fed more carefully than when running at large. Then, too, a new lot can be provided each year or each six months, which keeps the hens away from worms and diseases to a great extent. Baby chicks should be handled in similar manner.

Hatch Goose Eggs

Goose eggs may be hatched by the goose herself, or by hen or incubator. One of the two latter methods is to be preferred because the goslings hatched by hen or incubator are just as strong and healthy as those hatched by the mother goose and while they are being hatched the goose may be broken of her broodiness and induced to lay another setting of eggs. The incubator thermometer should record the same as for hen eggs.

POULTRY HINTS

While some men overfeed, the common mistake is to feed too little.

• • •

Feed 20 to 40 pounds of dried skim milk to 100 pounds of mash if coccidiosis appears.

• • •

To buy more than four chicks for every square foot of brooder house space is a risky investment.

Intelligent marketing is doing much toward making turkey growing more profitable and successful.

It is better to make a reasonable profit on 100 chickens than it is to lose money, or break even, on 200 or 300.

There is a tendency to creamy white shells in some Leghorns, which can be largely eliminated by setting only pure-white eggs.

Cod liver oil should be omitted from the ration fed broilers for two weeks before marketing as otherwise the flesh will have a fishy taste.

• • •

A bred-to-lay hen weighing four pounds will change from seventy-five to eighty pounds of feed into twenty-five to thirty pounds of eggs in a year's time.

More moisture is required in the incubator in hatching goose eggs than is required in hatching hen eggs. This point must be kept in mind by the incubator operator.

City-Bred Cow Beats Her Country Cousins

The "back to the farm" movement received a rude jolt in Washington when this city cow, Lady Dodo Tehee, II, bred and owned by the United States Soldiers' home, carried off honors from her country cousins by producing 18,136 quads of milk, with 599.3 pounds of butter fat, in a year.
